

I oppose taking a vote that leads to more media consolidation. The majority of mainstream media is already owned by a handful of companies. Many differing viewpoints are never heard, and I fear the repercussions of reducing that number even further. The FCC should be looking out for the interests of the general public, not megamedia corporations simply looking to make more money. The lack of media attention to the issue of consolidation is a prime example, why should they even cover the issue if opposition is not in their best financial interest?
